Bath is a city of contrasts. Legend has it that its hot springs were discovered by pigs cured of leprosy after wallowing in warm mud. Beyond the world-famous Georgian crescents and Roman ruins lies a small city with an unexpected past: once home to giant industrial cranes shipped worldwide, the birthplace of Plasticine, and a place whose history narrowly escaped destruction by over-zealous planners. Its beauty and ancient origins even made it a bombing target during the Second World War. Most of the quirky corners featured in this book are within easy walking distance. But Bath's UNESCO World Heritage status extends beyond hot springs, Roman archaeology and Georgian architecture to include its dramatic natural setting, so be prepared for the occasional uphill walk. Along the way you'll discover burial grounds and bollards, a slippery lane and a sentry box. Why was England's first king crowned here? Where are traces of historic floods? Who built a treasure-filled tower to escape dull company – and why is one red postbox grey?

Martin Booth is the editor of Bristol24/7, South West England's leading news and entertainment website and magazine; and the author of 111 Places in Bristol That You Shouldn't Miss and 111 Places For Kids in Bristol That You Shouldn't Miss. He is usually found on a bicycle but is also is a walking tour guide. Barbara Evripidou is an award-winning photographer with three decades of experience. As a former press photographer, her images have been published in all the UK's national newspapers, and she has worked all over the world. The highlight of her career was working with the British Army in Bosnia, covering the efforts to rebuild the country. These days she focuses on PR, portrait and commercial work. When she's not got a camera in her hand you can find her at a metal gig, at the cinema or exploring Bristol - where she lives with her children, Theo and Anna.
