- Constable's letters selected and edited into a coherent narrative
- An unparalleled insight into a pioneering creative mind
- Richly illustrated and with an extensive introduction

John Constable (1776–1837) is England's best-loved landscape painter, and the familiarity of his images can disguise how revolutionary he really was. His passionate concentration on the truth of the natural world influenced not just other painters but the whole course of romanticism, and the spontaneity and energy of his vision and technique remain as fresh today as ever.

It was a long journey for this sensitive, not very sociable man, a journey whose fascinating twists and turns we can trace through his many vivid letters, where Constable shared his developing ideas and practice with a small group of friends and patrons. To read his letters today is to gain unparalleled insight into a pioneering creative mind. For the first time, these letters have now been selected and arranged into chronological order to create a coherent narrative. The editor is the leading expert on Constable, Anne Lyles, and she has also written an extensive introduction.

Anne Lyles worked at the Tate for over 25 years, specializing in late eighteenth and early nineteenth century landscape painting, in particular the work of John Constable, J. M. W. Turner and the British watercolor school. She has written extensively on these subjects and organized exhibitions throughout the UK and abroad. She is a trustee of the Constable Trust.

I left Aldgate about 2 o'clock – it began to rain about 3, & continued without intermission all the rest of my journey – I drove in at our gate about ten. I did not get at all wet for in addition to my own great coat, Samuel Taylor the coachman lent a large wrapping one, which kept me so warm & comfortable that I was often scarcely asleep on the coach box.

I found all my friends here quite well, & we make a charming family party, six of us – nine with Mr. Whalley's two children and your portrait! (which gives me great pleasure here, as an additional proof of your goodness & kindness to me). We are very happy among ourselves, and when we are all together it is really an interesting sight – I cannot however contemplate it without mixture of old associations inseparable to all sublunary affairs, – so used have I been on entering these doors to be received by the affectionate shake by the hand of my father and the
