- Documents two recent public buildings in the United States and Burkina Faso designed by celebrated Burkinabé-German architect Francis Kéré
- A unique combination of architectural documentation and photography with personal writing and original poetry
- A deeply resonant meditation on sustainability, cultural continuity, and the power of architecture to root us more fully in the world around us
- Francis Kéré was the first African-born architect to receive the Pritzker Prize in 2022

Spirit out of Trees traces richly illustrated the interwoven stories of two architectural works by Burkinabé-German architect Francis Kéré: Xylem, a contemplative pavilion nestled within the aspen groves of Tippet Rise Art Center in Fishtail, Montana, and the Naaba Belem Goumma Secondary School, built for Kéré's hometown community of Gando, Burkina Faso. Though separated by geography, climate, and culture, the two buildings are united by a shared philosophy: architecture as a site of gathering, learning, and care.

The book explores how trees—literal and metaphorical—inform Kéré's design language. Xylem evokes the spiritual and structural intelligence of trees, offering a space of quiet communion and passive cooling. Naaba Belem Goumma Secondary School transforms local materials into a living, breathing environment for education, shaped by and for its community.

Combining architectural documentation and photography with personal writing and original poetry, Spirit out of Trees is both a tribute to Francis Kéré's vision and to the enduring metaphor of the tree, as shelter and as a symbol of regeneration. Designed with the same humility and clarity that defines Kéré's work, the volume offers a deeply resonant meditation on sustainability, cultural continuity, and the power of architecture to root us more fully in the world around us.

Francis Kéré is a Burkinabé-German architect and 2022 Pritzker Prize laureate. His Berlin-based firm Kéré Architecture is widely recognised for creating innovative works that are often sustainable and collaborative in nature. He is also a professor of architectural design and participation at the Technical University of Munich.
